Women’s empowerment

Plus: Gender and mental health, working towards equality in Malawi and more...
Welcome to the latest edition of your newsletter, Health in Action. My name is Anuj Kapilashrami. I serve on Health Poverty Action and Find Your Feet’s trustee boards, and I am Professor in Global Health Policy & Health Equity. I’ve spent over twenty years working and researching health and development issues, with a particular focus on gender equality, human rights, and social justice.

Much of our work with communities focuses on challenging social inequalities, and their impact on women – from gender-based violence to economic precarity and marginalisation. And through our policy work, we see how women are disproportionately affected by poverty and health inequality.

In this edition, we launch our Women’s Empowerment Appeal, focusing on our work with communities, activists and health workers to ensure that women have fair and equal access to opportunities, resources, healthcare and a good quality of life.

Thank you for the part you are playing in building and sustaining a global movement for social change. I’m inspired every day by the amazing people that we work with; I hope you are too.
We have been working with women and communities in Rwanda since 1996 to address the challenges that women face. Alongside our partners, we have established three 'safe centres' in rural communities, where women who have experienced gender-based violence can receive vital support and information.

In addition to accessing key services through these 'safe centres', such as, psychological counselling, legal guidance, medical guidance, family mediation and family planning, survivors of gender-based violence can come together to learn skills, discuss their rights and support each other.

Furthermore, these 'safe centres' provide a space where the wider community, from families to teachers to police officers, can access information and support around gender-based violence and sexual and reproductive health. We have held meetings around gender-based violence, where public officials, health workers, activists and community members can share their perspectives, so they can better understand the issues and coordinate their activities.

Through these 'safe centres', we have trained over 150 women who have experienced gender-based violence in work readiness and entrepreneurship to support them in securing, sustaining and creating jobs. They have undertaken training on saving methods, with many forming saving and loan groups, so they can access money for business, healthcare or other expenses.

Many women have also completed training in tailoring, and we have provided sewing machines, tissue paper, silk and other materials, enabling them to start tailoring businesses.

Esperance, a young mother who has been supported through the 'safe centres', tells us: “The training helped us to overcome stigma, and it taught us how to behave in employment and how to create some small businesses. Initially, we felt that they should give us money for doing this training. But now... we feel like we are the ones who should give money to the person who trained us.”

This power imbalance also means they are often subject to sexual and physical violence, impacting on both their physical and mental health, and their overall wellbeing. This once again impacts on other areas of their lives, such as their ability to make a living.

Not only do women deserve equal rights and opportunities – gender equality and women's full enjoyment of human rights are essential to economic and social development. At Health Poverty Action and Find Your Feet, we know that improving women's rights is essential to achieving health for all. This is why women's rights are at the core of so much of our work.

Health Poverty Action and Find Your Feet are working with women in Africa, Latin America, Asia to challenge unhealthy gender dynamics - whether helping women in rural Sierra Leone protect their land rights or advocating for appropriate healthcare for indigenous women in Guatemala.

Right now, women around the world are empowering themselves. Together, we want to make sure all women have fair and equal access to opportunities, resources, healthcare and a good quality of life.

EMPOWERING WOMEN IN MALAWI

Executive Director of Find Your Feet Malawi, Melina Mtonga, tells us about our sister organisation’s work supporting women’s empowerment in the south-eastern African nation.

My name is Melina Mtonga. I work with Find Your Feet (FYF) Malawi as Executive Director, having joined the team originally in 2016 as Programme Manager. I hold over 22 years’ experience of studying and working in community, social and economic development.

FYF started working in Malawi in 2004 and, in 2016, FYF Malawi registered as an independent and autonomous organisation, working with rural communities to find sustainable solutions to hunger, poverty and discrimination.

Women’s issues

In Malawi today, one of the main issues we see driving poverty and hunger is gender inequality. Women do not have the same access to productive resources as men do. This is largely due to social norms which dictate that men are to be regarded as superior to women.

As such, men generally own land and many other assets – limiting women’s access to formal credit markets, as they often do not have enough resources to offer as collateral.

Women typically engage in subsistence farming, growing legumes for household consumption. Women face challenges in economic development because their spouses often prevent them from participating in economic activities.

Illiteracy levels are higher among women, with fewer girls completing secondary school than boys as many families believe that adolescent girls should focus on marriage rather than school.

Women’s participation in household decision making is limited. Recent analysis in Balaka district revealed that 87% of households’ key decisions are made by men and only 12.5% are made by women.

Most women and girls face some form of gender-based violence, whether emotional violence, economic violence, physical violence, sexual violence, child marriages or human trafficking.

Supporting women’s empowerment

FYF works alongside women and community leaders to challenge the stereotypes and gender inequality that arise from harmful social norms and attitudes. We hold community awareness meetings on gender equality, human rights, and advocacy against harmful social norms.

Together, we focus on women’s economic, social, and legal empowerment; breaking down the barriers that prevent women’s participation in decision making and leadership.

We help Village Saving and Loans Associations, whose members are primarily women, to develop links with financial service providers who offer affordable loans. With better access to credit, women have more opportunities to empower themselves economically.

We also analyse gender relations in the areas where we work, so we can understand their impact on our projects and the impact of our projects on gender relations. This analysis helps us to better plan future activities and to better advocate for the elimination of harmful cultural practices that hinder women.

Steps towards equality

Many of the women involved in our projects take up leadership positions and are actively involved in decision making at community level, largely because they have increased their confidence through gaining knowledge on human rights and financial literacy.

Some now run their own businesses, and their economic status has tremendously improved. Some have managed to build their own houses and buy vehicles, such as motorcycles. Families report that they are becoming more prosperous as women play a greater role in household decision making.

Ultimately, fighting gender inequality is everyone’s responsibility. Governments and Non-Governmental Organisations (NGOs), development partners, traditional leaders and men should challenge exclusion and address harmful cultural practices that marginalise women.

Your contributions mean we can continue to work with partners like FYF Malawi to defend women’s rights. Please visit www.findyourfeet.org to donate today.
Due to huge deficits in government funding in most countries in the majority world (otherwise known as the Global South), families are forced to pay entirely out-of-pocket for mental health care. Most often it is the care givers – the majority of whom are women - that bear the greatest burden including isolation, high stress levels and impoverishment. Although biological factors may play some role in prevalence rates, the interplay with psychosocial factors heightens the risks of mental ill-health for women and girls. For example, gender discrimination and gender-based violence have been reported to have a significant impact on mental health including depression and anxiety disorders. Women can also experience considerable psychological disorders related to reproductive health, including antenatal and postnatal depression.

In some countries such as Somaliland and Ethiopia, women often experience harmful practices like female genital mutilation, that have been associated with post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD). The World Health Organisation (WHO) estimates that more than 200 million girls and women alive today have undergone female genital mutilation (FGM) in 30 countries in Africa, the Middle East and Asia where FGM is practiced, with more than 3 million girls estimated to be at risk annually.

It is estimated that 60% of people attending primary care clinics, the majority of whom are women, have a diagnosable mental disorder (WHO: 2008). As the COVID pandemic, environmental threats, conflict, displacement and growing global income inequalities have demonstrated, women are disproportionately affected by many of the major challenges facing humanity.

The COVID social distancing measures and self-isolation in particular exposed women and girls – more than men and boys, to mental health risk factors as a result of increased cases of gender-based violence and the burden of caregiving.

As we advocate for appropriate attention and support around mental health, both nationally and internationally, we recognise and will continue to address the specific challenges that women face globally.

Too often, women bear the brunt of poverty and ill health. Lack of economic opportunities, education and access to land makes women more vulnerable to poverty and loss of income. As caregivers, women are often left to pick up the pieces, looking after those impacted by ill health. And discrimination in health care can result in poorer care for women. Meanwhile, gender-based violence poses a greater threat to women’s health than traffic accidents and malaria combined.

Your generous contributions support work with women and communities around the world to ensure that women have fair and equal access to opportunities, resources, healthcare and a good quality of life. Whether bringing women together to demand their rights, supporting women to develop their livelihoods or ensuring that women can benefit from appropriate healthcare, we are committed to overcoming the barriers facing women globally.

Please give to our Women’s Empowerment Appeal and help communities come together to defend women’s rights.
